The best time to install a ventilation system for the dairy stable is when the hay mow is empty. The free Cornell bulletin E-151 describes the Fairbanks-Goodman system of ventilation and tells how the intake and out-take flues are built. The system may be home-made and those who have installed the system say it works despite its simplicity. Costs vary according to the dairyman's adaptation of the plans but are low compared to built-in systems. Ask the office of publication of the New York State college of agriculture at Ithaca, N. Y., for your copy of bulletin E-151.

GET READY TO CAN

Prepare the equipment to be used in canning before the day on which the food is canned, suggests the state college of home economics at Cornell University. This saves time and energy for the preparation of the food and the actual canning processes.

First, wash in hot soapy water all jars, rubbers, glass lids, and tin cans and rinse thoroughly in clear hot water. Do not wet gasket-lined tin covers. Jars which have had spoiled food in them should receive the following special attention: If possible, after washing thoroughly, put the jars and lids into a pressure cooker at 15 pounds pressure for 15 minutes; otherwise boil jars and lids for two hours, in enough actively boiling water to cover them.

Next, test all jars, both old and new for leaks. Examine the glass jars and covers to see that there are no nicks, cracks or uneven places where the seal is to be made. Partially fill each jar to be used with hot water. Place the wet rubber and lid in position and completely seal the jar, invert and let it stand inverted for at least five minutes. If it leaks try the cover on another jar which you are sure is good. Also try another good cover on the jar just tested to determine whether the jar or the cover is faulty. Another possible cure, if the jar has a metal clamp-gum top, is to tighten the ball, bending it so that it will be more nearly straight across the top. Discard for canning purposes all cans and covers which are defective when this test is applied. Have enough new, good rubbers to fit the jars. If canning in tin cans, fill one or two with water and seal, to make certain that the tin can sealer is in working order.

About one-third of the fruit sold in New York City is sold by stores, and less than half is delivered by wagon.
