PILLOW FIGHTS

Pillow fights and bedtime romps are harmful to children, according to the New York State college of home economics. They make the child difficult to handle and may cause restless sleep.

An hour of quiet play, but before supper, may profitably be substituted; and supper should be a pleasant and social meal, where friction or unpleasantness should be avoided. A story hour or quiet games should follow the evening meal, to take the place of the more disturbing romps, and the play may lead naturally to bedtime if dolls are put to bed, other toys put away, and the child's surroundings prepared for the night.

The bedtime should be set according to age, and should not be altered for any reason. If the children find that it can be put off by teasing or delaying, they will put it off. They should be expected to go to bed peacefully at the appointed hour and no opportunity should be offered for delay or protest. When they have been tucked in for the night, the windows opened and the light put off, the parent should say good-night and leave the room immediately.

When company is expected in the evening, the children should be told. If they understand that it is grown-up company and does not concern them, they are likely to be more willing to go to bed according to schedule. When the parents go out for the evening, the children should be told and made to understand that it makes no difference in their bedtime.
