The husband sat most of that day n a trance waiting for his hideous dream to end. Sometimes he bowed his head in his hands, but the other watchers could not tell whether it was tears or sweat that ran down between his fingers. They fancied must be the latter, however, for his grief was too absymal for tears. Late in the afternoon Fisk heard the little brown Goya children playing in the road. They were laughing! He groaned aloud. Children! Gloria and he had wanted children, but there again the desert had thwarted them. This was no country for white women. A man might as well lock his wife in a furnace! and expect her to bear children. So Gloria was dying! And he had killed her! He rose and creaked' about the house, wringing his hands. His mental numbness was wearing off now and agony consumed him His mind was galloping, running away, and he talked incessantly, but' with a thick tongue and without finishing his sentences. Yes. He had killed her! He had staked her out on the blistering desert as the Apaches staked out their prisoners,
