Working overtime with Marleah Laffs soon became a habit with Ted. Afsoon became a nabit with 1ed. Arter hours of office work, they would lunch together or sometimes go to the Putnam home to eat, then go back to the office and finish up the Subn necessary things. Eating at the Putnam home soon became a habit with Ted and Marleah who were nov continually together talking and both thinking of the same things. In all of Ted's plans he decided that when he got married he wished to be able to ask Mr. Loren for a raise in salary.

The Putnam family grew accustomed to Ted's presence and they soon felt that Ted was part of the Marleah especially thought family. this, because they worked together so much and spent so much of their time in each other's homes. Mrs. White seemed to think that Marlesh was a good substitute for Joyce who was now away in training. Marleah was two years older than Joyce, with blonde wavy hair that always look-ed neat, and a smiling face which was not pretty, but extremely pleasant. Marleah sympathized with Ted's difficulties, the necessity for his quitting school and supporting the family because of his father's death. She'd had to do that same thing, but she later went to school and got a position afterwards. She seemed to understand Ted better than anyone else and Ted had much confidence in her.

Two years passed, Joyce has but one more year of training; Ted has paid back to the family account all that he borrowed; he has received not one but two raises in salary; his mother is comfortably situated now financially and it is not surprising to find a large diamond on Marlean's left hand. Ted and Marleah are receiving many congratulations, but the most surprising of all was from the hove who belonged to the club They sent a card congratulating Ted on his fine choice and pinned on the other side was all of the money Ted had gambled away. Under it was written: "Ted, we sure enjoyed your last night at the club with us, but we knew something was troubling you and we see now what it was. We are sending this so you can see how much we appreciated your fine com-pany, and we wish you the best of luck?

Ted was overjoyed with this be cause he could put an extra deposit in the bank. As the wedding day was drawing near, Mr. Loren has also promised to turn the entire re-(Concluded) sponsibility of the firm over to Ted after their wedding, which seemed to be the greatest of all presents that Ted and Marleah could receive to help make their life happy.
