home, Lopez exclaimed. "Well! That's the biggest wallop I ever had. It upsets everything."

"Don't you believe her?" "Sure! She must be telling the truth, but you're going to have a hard job to make a jury believe her."

"We'll have to check up, of course."

"That'll be easy. But remember, she's 'queer.' Everybody knows she's drunk half the time. She's a notorious character and—well, she'll prejudice herself."

"I'll take care of that. I'll see that she makes a good impression. I'm going to get her out of the pigsty, dress her up, and put her in a hotel and make her look like a human being. I'll take her off the whiskey, too, and make sure that she doesn't talk until I'm ready to have talk. This isn't an ordinary case, Chief; it's a newspaper trial. When the time comes I'm going to explode something."

"Oh, it'll be a big thing for you if you can get a conviction where our local people have failed to even start anything. But speaking of explosions, what about the Woods girl? This kind of blows up our theory about her, doesn't it?"

"We'll have to wait and see."

"Shall I show that 'Thursday' letter to the reporters? They're after me every day to see it. They know about as much as we do."

"Show them nothing until I tell you to. Now then, locate that automobile with one headline just as quickly as you can and bring me the name of the man who drove it."
