The Dairy Herd Restocks Itself

It is Best to Raise Replacements—Cow Wear Out Same as Machinery.

Dairy cows depreciate or "wear out" the same as farm machinery; and why not? inquires Karl Gardner of the animal husbandry department at Cornell University.

The cow puts out more energy every year than any other farm animal, including the horse, he says. She does it the most efficiently of all farm animals, and the farmer "has to pay for this production and efficiency in the short and productive life of the cow."

Few dairy cows ever live to see their eighth year, according to Gardner, even tho a cow is just in her prime at eight years. Figures show the average cow stays in the herd only five years after her first calving.

Dairy cows are removed from herds for many reasons other than depreciation. They may be unprofitable producers, and disease, especially Bang's disease and mastitis, takes a heavy toll.

Mr. Gardner urges New York dairymen to raise their own replacements for the dairy herd, because they cannot afford to purchase good cattle continually. Poor producers can be bought at low prices, but good dairymen do not want them.

"The enterprising farmer, interested in improving his herd, finds that raising his own replacements helps in the control of disease. It is also usually easier to finance the raising of calves than to put out from $60 to $150 for a cow every few months."
