COMMENCEMENT

COMMENCEMENT in Andover closed Wednesday night, when high school diplomas were presented to 25 of our young people.

About all the world can say to these young people entering its conflicts this week is not to be too pessimistic. This old world has gone thru troubles before and emerged from them, and will likewise recover from this struggle. Already there are signs that conditions are getting better. Colleges in general report that more of their graduates are being placed and statistics show that each year larger classes of men and women are being graduated from our institutions of higher education, so with the percentage of graduates obtaining jobs going up, there must be more jobs opening to them. This is an encouraging sign. It means that business and industry are again looking for new talent to train in their particular fields.

But whether times are good or bad, there are some things that are just about as true today as ever before. One is that the better prepared one is for a job the more likely he is to find one. Those boys and girls who can go on to colleges and technical schools and who are fitted for it should do so. The least they can do then is to hope that this troubled world will be straightened out by the time they finish.

To those who will not go on to college, we would say to keep your chin up. Think hard and try to capitalize on your talents. Don't sit back and twiddle your thumbs, hoping that a job will come to you. It won't come today. You've got to go out and fight for a job. You may have to take a job that doesn't appeal to you at first. You may not be able to earn as much money in your first job as you think you are worth.

Don't think too much about these things. Concentrate on getting your feet on the first rung of the ladder. That is your real goal. After you have achieved that goal try then to reach the next rung, always keeping your eye open for your real opportunity. Make yourself so valuable to your employer that he will soon find you indispensable.

The world is still looking for resourceful young men and women, with the courage to face the problems that arise, with a willingness to sacrifice to achieve their goal.

Town Spirit

A GREAT deal is said in schools and colleges about school spirit. By that it is meant that the students of that school should be loyal to its interests. That means working hard so the school shall have a good scholastic standing. It means backing up the athletic teams, and giving aid to every school enterprise.

That idea carries schools ahead and makes them famous. It should also be applied to towns. It should persuade people to back up their local enterprises, spend their money at home, give aid to movements planned to develop the town, co-operate in the effort to create a more beautiful place by improving their own dwellings and home grounds. If a town has that loyal co-operation, it is bound to go ahead.

This will stop tardiness: Issue orders that the whistle is to be blown by the last employee to arrive on the job.

Old lady: "Isn't it wonderful how these filling station people know exactly where to set up a pump and get gas?"

SANE INDEPENDENCE

AMERICANS will commemorate American independence next week, but chances are that too many of them won't even give a thought to the occasion they are celebrating. To those, it will be just another July 4—just another holiday, a day of noise, fireworks, bonfires and picnics.

American youth loves this scene of excitement. The big noises and bangs and burning fires of this holiday give the boy an elation that he does not find in sober exercises. American families like to give their children a good time, and so long as youngsters love noise, and so long as the dancing flames of a bonfire fill them with exultation, these observances will probably continue, to some extent.

Young people, however, should be taught that there is no sense in any celebration that creates physical injury or destroys property. The boy who has a finger blown off thru his carelessness, has accomplished nothing to celebrate the holiday.

Careful instruction in the handling of fireworks and close supervision should be the first duty of everyone during the celebration time.

Therefore, it might be well for the citizenry to remind itself that Independence Day is indeed a day to be commemorated; that independence is well worth fighting and dying for, but that self annihilation and injury thru carelessness is not the prescribed method for celebrating July 4.

Dying for American independence was the tragic role played by our forefathers. They died that their descendants might have freedom from oppressive government, but they had no desire that the descendants should continue the role simply as part of the celebration.

This Fourth of July will be saner if everybody will slow down a bit and give pause for a little thinking about what Independence Day really means.

Some time during the quiet hours of the day, if you can find them, the younger people, and in too many instances the older ones also, should be impressed with the real meaning of the day. They should be shown that on that day 163 years ago, the fathers of our country risked their lives to save their country. Today, July Fourth means in a larger sense, that we should give consideration to the well-being and preservation of the country that has given us such glorious opportunities.

Want to Predict Weather?

THE old-timers never hesitated to express their opinion about the weather to come in the immediate future. They knew the clues, the signs or whatever you wish to call them. But amateur forecasting has declined and it is a fascinating sport in which you can keep score of hits and misses and determine whether you are fairly accurate or not.

Weather leaves clues to what it is going to do next say the best amateur forecasters. Some of the indications of fair weather include: non-sticking windows and doors, free-flowing salt on your table; smoke ascending readily instead of flattening to the ground; high-flying birds and animals abiding peacefully in the fields instead of calling restlessly to one another as they do in stormy weather; small, fluffy white clouds floating lazily in the blue; light winds from a westerly direction; a gorgeous sun setting in a cloudless sky; a fog that rises early in the morning; a rainbow after a departing thunder storm.

The reverse of many of the above conditions is a fair indication that rain will come. The so-called "mackerel sky," sultry summer mornings when things are sticky and winds are unsettled, wind shifting to the northeast or south are some of the rain indications.

Do you know that' Hail almost never falls during cold weather?; no two snowflakes are just alike?! snow is not frozen rain?! lightning storms can be "measured" to determine how far away they are? To measure a lightning storm, count the seconds elapsing between the instant you see the lightning flash and hear the peal of thunder. Each five seconds elapsing means the storm center is approximately one mile away.

There is a great deal of amusement and some practical value in the sport of "guessing" the weather for the next day or two. Even the expert, professional forecasters are wrong some of the time. You may be able to "beat them to it" sometimes.

Some men look on the sunny side of life only when they are full of moonshine.

New Headlight Regulation In Force July 1st

Must Use Lower Beam in Meeting Cars—Lights May Be Adjusted to Show Farther Ahead.

Albany, June 26.—A new amendment to the headlight section of the New York State Vehicle and Traffic Law, designed to eliminate many night traffic accidents caused either by glare or by insufficient illumination, becomes effective July 1st, Commissioner Carroll E. Mealey of the Bureau of Motor Vehicles reminded motorists.

Two important provisions of the new law, which was enacted by the 1939 Legislature and signed by Governor Lehman on April 15, apply to the use of upper and lower beams of headlamps equipped to project two or more beams:

1—Motorists are prohibited from using the upper beam when meeting and passing cars on the open highway. The operator must switch to the lower beam when a vehicle approaching from ahead is within 300 feet.

2—Motorists are prohibited from using the upper beam in lighted areas where there is sufficient illumination to make visible substantial objects or persons 200 feet ahead. This means, in effect, that motorists should use the lower-most beam of their headlights in practically all lighted areas.

The new law, in addition to these provisions for use of the lower beam of headlamps so as to eliminate glare, also contains an amendment which provides for the use and adjustment of headlamps so that better and longer range illumination is obtained.

The law provides that "multiple beam headlamps shall be sufficient to reveal any person, vehicle or substantial object on the highway straight ahead of such vehicle for a distance of 350 feet and single beam headlamps shall be sufficient to reveal any person, vehicle or substantial object on the highway straight ahead of such vehicle for a distance of at least 200 feet." The old law requires headlights capable of illuminating objects only 200 feet ahead in any circumstances.

The fact that over one-third of the glaring headlight accidents occur in city streets or lighted areas adjacent thereto. These accidents occur principally because operators use the upper beam of their headlamps in spite of the fact that the dazzling light of the upper beam is not needed in lighted areas. The lower beam, which does not glare, provides sufficient headlight illumination in such areas.

"This does not imply that when the operator reaches lighted areas he should turn out his headlamps and use parking lights. There are more personal injury accidents involving parked cars in lighted areas than in unlighted areas, apparently because of a lack of ability on the part of the operator to see far enough ahead in such areas. Headlights should be used in lighted areas because parking lights are marker lights and do not illuminate the highway.

The amendment to the headlight law increases the legal range of illumination from automobile headlights but it is well to remember that illumination is still insufficient for driving safely at night at the same speeds used in daylight hours. It is for this reason that all authorities on traffic safety glare agree that cars should be driven at a lower speed at night than during the daytime. It is still wise to "slow down after sundown."

10:30 a. m., Public Worship. Sermon by the pastor. Subject "Why Independence?"

11:45 a. m., Church School. The study subject is "Choosing and Holding Fast the Best." It is an old testament lesson recording the dream of Soloman. Too often it has been charged against our religion that it presents fine ideals for our thought, but does not tell us how to gear the ideals into the machinery that actually has to move the world. Here are a few points of contact that Solomon saw over twenty-five hundred years ago. To begin with, he made it clear that the chief factor in national importance is not material wealth and military glory. Solomon saw clearly the imperative need of justice between the subjects of a nation if that nation was to endure.

The great thing that Solomon asked for and which he considered the best he could have was an understanding heart. That is our principal lesson here. Let us gather in our classes and enjoy the study.

"Don't Step Up Milk Supply," Noyes Warns Dairymen

Com. of Agriculture Cautions Milk Producers Against Creating Too Large a Surplus.

No milk price-fixing orders can stand the strain if dairymen step up their production to a point where the surplus of milk is too great, Commissioner Holton V. Noyes of the State Department of Agriculture and Markets told farmers at a picnic in Chautauqua county last Saturday.

With the resumption of milk price-fixing to producers scheduled for July 1, Commissioner Noyes warned that the benefits of the orders will be defeated unless the industry voluntarily controls the production of milk. He described this as "our next great dairy problem" and declared "its solution should originate with the dairymen themselves." The commissioner said:

"From the date when we established federal-state regulation, many producers thruout the State began to add to their herds, or to step up production by intensified feeding. In some cases I have been informed production of individual farms has almost doubled. The reason for this increased production was, of course, to benefit from the stabilized and regulated prices established by the government, but its result were a production this spring which approximated ten per cent above the five-year average at a time when price regulation had been suspended and economic conditions were none too favorable.

"Now that this form of price regulation has been so firmly established by ruling of the Supreme Court, it will be a natural tendency of many, if not most of our dairymen, again to increase production to take advantage of the improved prices. If this is done to any considerable extent, it is not at all improbable that one year from today we may find production so greatly increased that no price-fixing orders can withstand the strain of such a surplus. If that should be the case, I think the whole plan of price regulation will unjustly be termed a failure and agitation begun for some other experiment to meet the situation. This is what we want to avoid.

"So if I have any message at all for you today, it is that you and your neighbor, in co-operation with your producer organization, begin at once to think seriously about what can be done to establish some form of production control, preferably on a voluntary basis initiated and enforced by the dairymen themselves. You will find both Federal and State governments anxious and willing to help in this study. Both will be reluctant to have the enforcement of such a plan placed in their hands. Each will prefer that it be done by the producers. If and when we can evolve such a system and put it into operation, I am sure then we may feel that at least we are making real progress toward permanent and satisfactory solution of most of the problems of this great industry."

Commissioner Noyes renewed his plea for crop diversification as a means of farm income insurance. He cited the examples of other states which have built up reputations for their products and predicted New York will do the same with its inspected produce bearing the quality trademark of the State.

Describing the Empire State label undertaking as holding out a maximum promise of benefit to agriculture, Commissioner Noyes observed that once the consumer realizes the quality of the product bearing the Empire State label "the whole field of crop diversification will be opened up and more farmers will turn from milk to the production of other cash crops for which their farms are adapted."
