arly man. They were like restrain r jackets, too binding to express 'ully the richening thought and experience of his daily life. Somehow, probably in a graphic flash of insight, he grasped the value "chaining together" pictographis symbols with ideas. In such manner, then, the symbol for "mouth" also meant "speaking" the symbol 1 "sun" also meant "day." The resultant was an "ideogram," 'a symbol representing a generalized, idea derived from an object. Ideo graphic writing has persisted down to the present day. Leading practitioners of this system of writing are the modern Chinese.

But once again, man's hungry, need for expression outran the means at his command. Man chaffed under the restriction of ideograms as he had under pictographs. He not only acted now, but started to think. Things no longer just happened; he got to "mulling over" his experiences. When hunting, not only drew bow on a deer speared a fish, but thought out rather carefully just when, and where,
