Workers' Insurance For Their Families

Many people do not realize that they have insurance protection under the Old-Age and Survivors Insurance program of the Social Security Act—protection which will bring a monthly check to families as well as to the retiring worker over 65 years of age, it is announced by Stanley R. Putnam, manager of the Jamestown Field Office.

Five years ago when the Social Security Act passed, it included insurance to provide an income for aged workers after their retirement. Last year, however, Congress amended the Social Security Act to provide additional benefits for the wives and children of retiring workers and for the widows and school-age children of workers who die in their prime, Mr. Putnam added.

These are not relief payments, Mr. Putnam explained, neither are they, as in the case of workmen's compensation, paid only if the worker's death is caused by his work. Old-Age and Survivors Insurance payments come to the family of the deceased worker regardless of any other income. He and his employer have contributed the taxes which constitute the premiums of the system.

So long as the worker is regularly employed, so long as one penny is being deducted from each dollar of his check and properly reported he can feel sure that the premiums on this insurance policy are being paid, and that his wife and young children have protection which would bring them a regular monthly check in the case of his death, it was added. Nearly a million Americans will be receiving Old-Age and Survivors Insurance benefits by the end of the current year, according to estimates.
