There are few things which cause parents as much anxiety as to have their child hospitalized. The worry about how the child will react to the unfamiliar surroundings. Will he be homesick? What effect will hospitalization have on his development and growth? Will he be frightened among so many strangers? These and many other worries beset parents and usually they are unecessary. There are, to and bad features be sure, good of hospitalization, but by preparing the child for his hospital experience in advance, the strangeness and pangs of separation can be overcome to a large extent. of the staff Hospital who work with sick children every day, have great admiration for their Children are possessed of tremendous courage, strength and imwhich enables those who have developed some independence to accept each new experience as a challenging adventure. Armed wtih endless curand inventiveness, these children can find much in a hospital to delight and interest them so that soon the initial strangeness disappears. They are amazingly adept in adjusting themselves to physical limitations and discomforts provided they receive understanding and courageous help. It is regrettable that most hospitals still do not encourage enough parent-child contact during hospitalization because parents are the logical source of a child's security and strength. It is important that parents do not show anxiety or apprehension front of their child because children react quickly to the attitudes of those around them. parents appear clam and confident, the child will reflect their faith and courage. Having the ability to adept themselves to new situations, children are generally far happier patients than adults who have lost this youthıl resiliency. Illness can be an enriching experience to a child provided he s given understanding support. Every experience offers opporfor development of a child's personality, interests, selfreliance and resourcefulness which are the foundation of a satisfy-ing adult life. Adults can learn much from the courage, trust and fortitude of most hospital. ized children. It is a privilege to work with them toward the restoration of their health.
