Editorial

Would you like to know some facts and figures about American teens? An interesting article appeared in Newsweek magazine which dealt with an extensive survey of teen-agers and their ideals.

The number of American teen-agers exceeds the population of Australia and New Zealand. Most of these are happy contented kids who think most of the world is happy too and that the rest should be.

Ninety-six per cent of America's teenagers believe in God. Nearly all teens like school. They believe it is a good place to cultivate friendships and social life (and, incidentally to learn). Parents are forever lecturing and showing disadvantages of going steady. It might interest these parents to know that there is less going steady now than ever before. Teens have found out going steady keeps them "tied up".

Most teens believe college is wonderful and naturally everyone wants to go, but they also believe that there is more to life than college.

Teen-agers spend over twelve billion dollars a year. A lot of money? — yes! When asked which famous people they admired most teens answered "John F. Kennedy". Other famous people admired in order of population are: Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, Lyndon B. Johnson, Helen Keller, Winston Churchill and the Beatles. There were several others listed and at the end of the list — Albert Einstein. This is not so strange for being a genius as he was perhaps he did not have to put so much effort forth.

What punishments work best? The best punishment, teens feel, is grounding. Scolding is no good. Talking over the problem is good, but teens feel few parents really understand problems.

Nearly eighty percent like their homelife. Others feel they can take it or leave it. Many feel they will allow their children to date at the age of thirteen. Probably things will be different when the chance to decide really comes, but who knows?

These are only a few of the facts arrived at in the survey. I'm glad I'm a teen in my generation and no matter what anyone says, when the responsibility rests on our shoulders, we'll do a fine job. We aren't worried about ourselves; so why is everyone else? Well, teens are like everyone else. We may have strange ways but it's been the same throughout history and will never change.
