Editorial

"If someone answers, hang up." There's a new game or rather a renewed game being played by several high school and some grade school students.

The object of this game is to call up some perfect stranger and try to convince him or her that he or she has won some perfectly ridiculous contest or try to make him or her believe that some old flame or secret admirer is calling. These calls may be amusing to the caller, but not to the recipient of them.

Too few people realize that telephones are not toys. They are put in homes for responsible people to use. I'm sure that no student would intentionally prevent an emergency, long distance, or important business call to reach its destination. No student would intentionally scare someone to the point of being ill. However, it's about time that these people stopped to think about what they're doing.
