Bill Lamale WNY Feature

"Sim" and Ida Neu didn't Linew any more about fishing than I do. But they were friends of lishermen for miles around, and they knew just what was bicing.

When I saw them they were liv ing in a little cabin on a side road in the lake country. An acre or two of ground went with it, and the Neus had gone there for the view of the water.

They had retired from a smale radio repair business in Buffalo. Their place was like any other lakeside cabin, except that fishermen were always pulling up in harry. There was a big sign out in front: WOEMS. The Neus had bought property from a bachelor farmer who had moved out West. "Well, we knew he raised fishworms out that didn't mean any thing to us, 'Sim said. "We didn't see one of 'em. We just liked the land and the view, and wanted to be left alone." The Neus had barely moved in when the fishermen began arriv worms?" they'd ask. The preceding owner had grown them for years, and sold them in cardboard shoulders, some of the fishermer would always ask if they might spade up a few. Sim would say
