

PROCLAMATION

By The Governor

Governor Rockefeller has proclaimed February as "Heart Month" in New York State to emphasize the magnitude of the heart disease problem he said is "responsible for more than one-half of all the deaths in the nation."

"Fortunately," the Governor said, "research has made many advances in the detection, treatment and rehabilitation of the cardiac patient so that more and more people stricken with heart disease are now leading full, productive lives."

Terming New York "a pioneer in the heart research field" he cited as "very fruitful" a pilot heart disease study among a select group of males at the Cardiovascular Health Center and added: "In the last decade, the State has also conducted demonstrations on developing well-rounded programs for early discovery, diagnosis and treatment of heart diseases; provided State aid for rehabilitation of certain types of cardiac patients; provided tuition fellowships to physicians for study in cardiology; and provided financial aid for consultation clinics for the evaluation of cardiac patients."

"Our citizens should be aware," the Governor said, "of the magnitude of the heart problem and of the lay and professional education programs being carried on by the New York State Heart Assembly, the American Heart Association and others fighting against premature death and disability from this disease."

Leslie Swarthout, 1967 County Heart Fund Drive Chairman, today released a list of captains. Miss Marjorie Goodrich is Andover's Chairman for the Heart Fund.

100 Drive After Drinking

Bill Lamale
WNY Feature

Twice daily, and three times on Saturday, the bus stopped at Axel Horn's store to pick up passengers who had business in town.

After buying tickets, folks would wait under the canopy in front, studying the Mail Pouch thermometer or just talking.

Sometimes the men would go back into the store for chewing tobacco or cigars. Axel was a very plain man, bony and awkward. His gold-rimmed spectacles were always slipping forward on his nose. Sometimes he stuttered. His hair was thin but he let it grow long and obtained a patent leather glow by applying petrolatum.

When the bus was late, the men would josh Axel a bit. "How about putting a nice big bench out in front?" they'd ask.

"If I did the boys' just snitch it on Hallo'een."

There were ruts in the road in front of the store, and in the summer the dust would blow from it. One Spring Saturday a new Buick touring car came roaring along, struck a mud hole and splashed a patron waiting at the stop.

Axel rushed out with his feather duster, apologizing to Miss Lois Feiler, the switchboard operator who was wearing a salmon pink outfit and carrying a parasol of the same hue. After brushing away the spatters, Axel pulled out his linen handkerchief and dabbed at a spot on her cheek.

As soon as the bus pulled away Axel patched up the road. That night when he closed the store, he didn't head for his room up over Beam's Hardware. Instead he went to the back of his store and began sawing up some scrap lumber.

Axel had never done any carpentry before. But now he resolved to build a bench. His thumb got in the way and he sawed into it. When he tried to drive a nail he missed and pounded the same thumb. The next day he wore a bandage and smelled of turpentine.

When someone asked him how he got hurt, Axel just stuttered. Then he said he was making a bench.

The men standing outside at the bus stop uttered a little hurr-hurr and said, "Well it's about time."

It wasn't very fast with his project but he was steady. Every now and then he'd appear with injured fingers. The men figured it must be some bench Axel was constructing. Probably it was all oak and ten feet long. They even offered to help him carry it out.

Finally, the carpentry was all done and Axel himself took a bus into town to get the right paint. When the enamel was dry, Axel unveiled his bench. But it certainly wasn't what everyone had expected. And Axel didn't put it in front at all. He placed it just inside the entrance of the store and stenciled across the back, "Bus Patrons Only." Moreover, he didn't even bring out the bench on weekdays.

In time bus travelers began calling Axel Horn's handiwork the "Saturday morning bench". Patrons waiting for the bus stood just as they always had.

But any late morning, weekend travelers were in luck. Axel had the bench in position and waiting the backboards freshly dusted. On the seat was a little cushion. The bench itself was appallingly engineered; there was barely room for two, but even worse was its color. Still, folks observed, it just happened to match the outfit worn by Miss Feiler as she sat there once a week waiting for a ride into town.

Walkley Supports Bill To Help Justice Court Fees

Assemblyman Frank Walkley, of the 148th Assembly District, stated that he has supported a bill which would raise from five to ten dollars the fee collected by towns and villages for proceedings in justice of the peace or police courts. The bill would also apply to traffic offenses in cities, including New York City.

Towns should have a larger share of the fines collected by their local courts. Court operating costs, justices' salaries, as well as legally regulated fines have all increased in recent years. The five dollar statutory fee which goes to a town for every court proceeding has remained static, however, for the past twenty years.

Mr. Walkley said towns cite heavy costs in connection with the operation of local courts. Alcohol tests made in drunken driver cases and training schools for justices are supported with town funds.

The estimated revenue increase to the local governments would be nearly $3,000,000. In 1968, the bill would go into effect on April 1, 1968. The New York State Association of Towns supports the measure.
