Portuguese Here First Not Pilgrims

by Roger Langley

Remember when history used to be accused of repeating itself? Not any more. One set of facts is hardly digested when along comes a new theory shattering cherished beliefs.

Parents who have been scared away from helping junior with his homework because of the new math, now had also better watch their step with history lessons.

Last year, the one history question everyone could answer -- who discovered America? -- was shot out from underneath us. Generations have lived comfortably with the notion that Columbus made it here first, but new research says Chris found a sign on the beach reading "Welcome to the New World. Signed, The Vikings."

Now comes the latest blow. A hatchet job on the Pilgrims.

The new version has it that the Mayflower crew, looking sick and hanging around Plymouth Rock waiting for Thanksgiving dinner, were not the first here, but rather were late arrivals to New England.

Guess who it was, dressed in tuckers and carrying feathers, who met the Pilgrims at the shore. A bunch of Portuguese sailors that's what. Holly Vasco da Gama!

Dr. Daniel F. Brinton, a noted authority on the subject, says that the first white men to step ashore in what is now known as New England.

Dr. Brinton says that the first white men to step ashore in what is now known as New England.

According to DaSilva, the Indian chief who befriended the Pilgrims was named Osanaquima, which means "Glory to the king" in Portuguese. His title was Massasoit, which the Pilgrims lifted to make the name Massachusetts.

The chief's brother, Quadequina, had a name which was 100 per cent Portuguese, according to Da Silva. The doctor, whose field is medicine and who is an amateur archeologist and linguist, says his research shows the Indian language is laced with Portuguese words and that Portuguese names have been given to rivers, lakes and locations in the new world long before the Pilgrims had their collars starched.

According to DaSilva, the first colonizers in New England were the Cortereal brothers. Gaspar Cortereal set sail in 1501 for America, he says.

A year later his brother, Miguel Cortereal went looking for him. Neither expedition made it back to Portugal.

Dr. DaSilva believes the Cortereal brothers, "mingled freely" with the natives, "motivated by missionary zeal or by a real sense of brotherhood, or perhaps by simple promiscuity."

Anyway by 1620, when the Bradfords and the Mathers were unloading the big M, the decent parts of the brothers Cortereal came down to dockside to stare at the greenhorns.

Here's how the conversation might have gone:

"Mind if we park the Mayflower here?" one of the Pilgrim fathers asks.

"Ugh," answers the Portuguese Indian. "This free country so far no have-um quota system worked out yet."

"Well let us live as brothers," says the Pilgrim father.

"Ugh" says Rain-in-face Cortereal. "We smoke-up peace pipe, later on have-um Thanksgiving dinner."

"Splendid. Your boys can handle the kitchen details, we'll take care of the speeches," says the Pilgrim father.

"Ugh," says the chief. "We have-um much bounty here in the land where the deer and antelope play."

"Been here long?" "Ugh," says the chief. "Many moons ago, great, great, great grandfather Migual came and discover new world."

"What do you call the place?" "We call-um land of the brave."

"Our gang sort of learns toward home of the free," says the Pilgrim father.

"Ugh," says the chief. "Let us reason together."

"How's that again?" says the Pilgrim father.

"Make-um compromise," says the chief. "Call-um home of the brave and the land of the free."

"Splendid."

"What's that you writing?" asks the chief.

"Oh nothing," says the Pilgrim father. "Just adding a few notes to the plan for the reservation."

"What is Reservation?" asks the chief.

"Oh, nothing," says the Pilgrim father. "Just something we cooked up on the way over. We'll be filling you in on the details later."

"Ugh," says the chief. "Let us know if we can help in any way."

"Will do," says the Pilgrim father. "These are interesting items, what do you call them?"

"This cigar store Portuguese, this Portuguese head penny."

"And the children," interrupts the Pilgrim father. "And what are they doing?"

"They are playing with the Portuguese."
