State Ed. Dept. Designs Measuring Instruments For Performing Arts Ed.

New York State's unprecedented venture into performing arts education, which already has reached more than one million students in secondary schools, is looking for yardsticks by which to measure the quality of the program.

The launching of a study of develop evaluation instruments has been announced by Dr. Walter Crewson, Associate Commissioner for Elementary, Secondary, and Continuing Education of the State Education Department.

Commissioner Crewson pointed out that the integration of performing arts into the regular school curriculum is so new in education that no known evaluating instruments exist which specifically apply "In evolving such instruments," he said, "the State Education Department will have the close assistance of two research specialists from the United States Office of Education - Miss Kathryn Bloom and Junius Eddy".

When completed, the guides will be incorporated into the Education Department's Cooperative Review Service, to enable school districts to evaluate their own programs in performing arts education.

In essence, he explained, an evaluation instrument is a set of criteria for judging the effectiveness of an instructional procedure. The Department has two immediate goals in mind: an instrument for measuring the impact of performing arts on the students; another for schools to measure their own achievements in the new field. It is felt that a totally new kind of evaluation method will need to be developed to measure pupil growth in appreciation of such performing arts as music, dance, and drama.

Under Commissioner Crewson's chairmanship, an evaluation conference on the performing arts was held at the State Education Department in Albany, at which the problem of measuring results was discussed. Participants included: Richard C. Bloch, project administrator, Bergen County Project, New Jersey; John Noble, director of humanities, Liberty Central Schools; Mrs. Elaine Grossinger Etess, Board of Education, Liberty, New York; Dr. William Brooks consultant in arts and humanities, Division of Curriculum Instruction, New Jersey State Education Department; Harry Deutsch, director of development, New York State Council on the Arts; Vincent Foley, West Babylon Senior High School; Mrs. Irma Grey, Mid-Hudson Regional Supplementary Education Center.

Arnold Heyl, associate director, Central Atlantic Regional Educational Laboratory; Keith Martin, director, Roberson Center for Arts and Sciences; Clint Marantz, Huntington High School; Miss Carol Morse, executive director, Young Audiences, Inc.; Miss Fannie Handrick, director of research, Educational Laboratory Theater; William Schneider, acting director, Project Spotlight, New Jer-
