No "Shut-Off" of Water For Niagara Falls

The most-dramatic phase of a geological study of the American Falls — "turning off the water" that flows over the cataract — has been postponed from this spring to 1969.

The study has been underway for three years, with its aim to determine what steps can be taken to clear away an accumulation of rock at the base of the American Falls and to diminish the probability that future rockslides may turn the cataract into an extension of the upper rapids.

Engineers have found that the detailed survey will cost about $1-million more than is available and have postponed the de-watering of the American Falls until the funds are available from government sources, possibly agencies both in the U. S. and Canada. Cost of the study has been borne by the U. S. federal government up to this point. While the Niagara River, which feeds the falls is shared by the U. S. and Canada, the American Falls is entirely within U. S. territorial waters.

Major rockslides in 1931 and 1954 and smaller slides from time to time have deposited huge piles of rock below the American Falls. Some of the chunks rise almost halfway from the river toward the brink of the 182-foot-high cataract.

Erosion is not as much of a problem at the Horseshoe Falls, the larger of Niagara's two principal waterfalls. A project in the 1950's evened the flow over the Horseshoe and reduced the erosion there.

The idea of "turning off the falls" like a giant water faucet long has intrigued visitors to the international cities of Niagara Falls. "When do they turn them off?" has been a question asked, usually accompanied by a smile, by thousands of visitors each year. Until recently, residents had no answer except the serious one, "They don't."

De-watering, when it occurs, will be a reasonably simple chore for the engineers. They will build a cofferdam from Goat Island, the strip of land between the two falls. This will dry up the channel to the American Falls, enabling geologists and engineers to exposed the crevices in the river bed and the escarpment and to make a decision on removal of the rock at the base.

The water diverted from the American Falls would flow over the Horseshoe Falls and could be used to produce additional hydro-electric power. A decision on which course will be followed has not been reached.

The U. S. and Canadian Joint Commission, a special agency, is supervising the project under the terms of a 1950 S. Army Corps of Engineers agreement.

The delay means that the "giant water faucet" will flow on this summer, with 60,000 gallons pouring over the crest of the American and Horseshoe Falls each second.

Proclamation By The Governor

This is "Grange Week" in New York State, so designated by Governor Rockefeller in a proclamation of tribute to what he called "one of the most valuable institutions in our society."

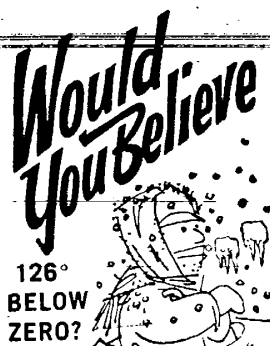

In designating April 15 - 21 as a period of recognition for the Grange, the Governor said it is "particularly helpful" in New York State "where agriculture is one of our principal industries."

"The Grange is a great farm fraternity and also serves a most beneficial purpose by helping to develop leadership, encourage education, promote community betterment, instill an appreciation of high ideals and teach through work and play the value of cooperation and service in the attainment of happiness."

"In the Empire State the Grange has merited appreciation for its support of sound legislation. It has promoted laws for the good not only of the farmers but of other groups as well."

"The organization also has rendered admirable service by promoting neighborliness and rural neighborhoods. This in turn helps make our whole State a closely knit community, with consequent benefits enhancing the prosperity and prestige of the State."
