Use Repellents
Avoid Bug Bites

Biting insects often ruin people's outdoor fun. Camping and outdoor cooking can be made much more pleasant by using an insect repellent, according to Prof. James E. Dewey, entomologist at the N. Y. State College of Agriculture, Cornell University.

"It is not the smell of a repellent that keeps the bugs away, but the feeling of treated skin," said Dewey. One should never buy an insect repellent just because it has a more powerful odor than another, he warned.

Of the 7,000 chemical repellents tested by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, only five were found to be safe for use as directed and effective against most common biting insects. These five are generally known as diethyl-meta toluamide ("deet"), ethyl hexanediol, dimethyl phthalate, dimethyl carbate, and Indalone. "Although all five are equally efficient when used in comparable strengths, 'deet' lasts the longest," Dewey said.

The label on a repellent indicates the per cent of active ingredient. He explained that the higher this percentage, the less often a new application will be needed.

"Look for the brand with the highest percentage of one of the above active ingredients," Dewey advised, "but also consider the convenience of the packaging."

Liquids are generally more concentrated, therefore less expensive per ounce of active ingredient. Sprays are more convenient for application on large areas of skin or clothing, but are most costly. Premoistened towlettes are even more expensive, but are handy to carry.

Repellents should be applied liberally over every area of exposed skin, except for the eyes and lips. Instead of spraying a repellent directly onto the face, Dewey advised applying it with the palms. Also, the inside edges of all openings in clothing should be treated and from the tops of socks and stockings to below shoe level.

The formulation of the repellent, the individual, and the kinds of insects in the area influence the length of time between applications. Also, the repellent is frequently wiped off when the skin is wet from sweating. Dewey said these factors account for the fact that repellents are totally ineffective on some people.

New Balloon Distress Program Creates Interest

Following are excerpts of remarks by Motor Vehicle Commissioner Vincent L. Tofany to the New York State Association of Chiefs of Police at a luncheon held at Grossingers recently.

Educating motorists to meet highway emergencies is a key objective of the new balloon distress program for stranded travelers, Tofany said.

He told the New York State Association of Chiefs of Police that the novelty aspect of the balloon signals has created an interest which is helping to educate the significant number of motorists who take to the road with limited knowledge of emergency procedures.

Commissioner Tofany said widespread requests for details of the balloon code have enabled the distribution of more than one million printed items which also list recommended procedures for highway emergencies.

Under a program announced this month, the Commissioner is urging stranded motorists to display color-coded balloons to alert bypassers to the type of aid needed. Three colors are used: Red for medical aid; Green for police assistance; and Blue for mechanical help, or fuel.

Noting that balloons may be purchased anywhere at low cost, he said this color code can be employed immediately on any type of road, by any traveler, in any type of vehicle.

"This represents a convenience for any traveler unable or unwilling to leave his vehicle," he said, "since all the bypasser need do is report the nature of the emergency to proper authorities at the first opportunity, without the necessity to stop and investigate."

Commissioner Tofany also reviewed safety legislation introduced by Governor Rockefeller, including a pilot program of rehabilitation courses for problem drivers, and the three hours of highway safety instruction to be required of every new driver after January 1, 1969.

The Commissioner called these new laws "a few of the approaches we are using to improve all three elements of traffic safety — The driver, the vehicle, and the highway."
