Fish like cover — places to hide and wait for easy meals. When you couple this knowledge with the fact that summer's sun has produced vast and varied weed beds in New York's waters, you'll know where to fish. Try the lettuce patches, as many anglers call these underwater gardens.

Within the last two weeks, I've caught four kinds of game fish from weed beds — smallmouth bass, largemouth bass, walleyes, and northern pike.

Weeds are frequently difficult to fish if you don't have the proper lures, so keep a varied assortment in your tackle box. There are several good weedless spoons on the market which have been consistently successful throughout the years. Garnished with a pork chunk or strip, this lure makes a mighty appetizing morsel.

If you have the tackle to handle it, a weedless hook and pork chunk is a natural and appealing bait. Resembling a small frog in action and feel, it rarely misses if game fish are in a feeding mood, particularly largemouth bass.

Another method is to use regular lures and troll or cast over the weeds. This can be frustrating, for there always seem to be tall patches of vegetation that snag your hooks. But it's also a way to catch a lot of fish.

When fishing in extremely weedy waters, use a slightly heavier line than normal. An eight-pound test monofilament line is ordinarily strong enough to handle almost any size bass in open water, but not in weeds. You'll lose fish and waste time retrieving snagged lures if your line isn't strong enough to pull free.

In casting weed beds, employ your outboard motor to get into position upwind of your fishing area, then shut it off. Let the wind drift you over the underwater vegetation.

Do not overlook lily pads when searching for bass — they will sometimes hide right under the layer of leaves. One of the largest bass I've even seen came after a weedless lure snaked across the surface of some pads. The effect was only slightly smaller than a hand grenade going off under water.

Rig yourself properly, know your lake, and fish the lettuce patches. It will put a little excitement into your dog-days fishing.

Summer Over Camping Season Not

Though summer is over, the camping season is not, at least 28 of the 43 public campsites operated by the New York State Conservation Department in the Adirondacks and Catskills.

Fifteen of these campsites closed as of Sunday, September 7. Twenty-eight others will remain open, some with a Campsite Caretaker on duty, and some without as late as December 2.

Whenever a Caretaker is on duty a permit must be obtained from him before the camper begins his stay, and the usual camping and day-use service charge will be collected. Otherwise, there is no charge for use of the sites. When a Caretaker is not on duty, it is suggested that the camper notify the local Forest Ranger before camp is set up.

Water and sanitary facilities will be in service until there is danger of freezing weather and the possibility of damage. All other facilities will be available throughout the period the campsites are to remain open.

Hunters using the public campsites may possess firearms in these areas during the hunting season.

Greenwood Central School News

Money for five library books in memory of Mr. Jerry Burd has been given to Greenwood Central School by the Dads of Foreign Service Veterans, District No. 3 of Department of New York, the Past Masters of the Masons and Mrs. Mary and Rita Burns of Andover.

Books were selected from the various fields in which Mr. Burd served the community of Greenwood in the postal department, firemen, democrat committeeman, and the Boy Scouts. The books selected are library editions of Boy Scouts of America - Field Book for Boys and Men; Post Office Department by Gerald Gullivan, 1968 edition; General Alarm, A Dramatic Account of Fires and Fire-Fighting in America, by Haywood, 1967 edition; Red Letter Days, by Elizabeth Sechrist; and Robert F. Kennedy, the Myth and the Man, by Victor Lasky.

Department regulations, however, forbid the discharge of firearms on public campsites at any time. No wood, except from dead and down trees or from supplies furnished by the Department, shall be used for fuel.
