A SALUTE TO SCHOOL LUNCH

National School Lunch Week begins this Sunday, October 12. What you eat affects you in those weeks. Well, there's no doubt Americans are subjected to certain products and services. Such observations are staples of our commerce. Similarly, many a good cause has adopted the technique. For that matter, I believe such stalwart, worthwhile efforts as Easter Seals helped originate this kind of promotion, and one can hardly be critical.

An Important Task

For these reasons, I'm all for National School Lunch Week. Helping our children to be better fed and to know better what constitutes good nutrition is one of the more important tasks confronting us as a nation.

Surveys show us that good eating habits are not necessarily influenced by affluence. While the greatest of our malnutrition occurs among our underprivileged citizens, it is also true that many families at all economic levels do not make proper food choices. For example, many teenage girls and adult women, at all income levels, get less than the recommended amounts of certain essential nutrients. Ac-

...and the effort at school is not just one of feeding. For the child, the school lunch experience is an actual demonstration of the nutrition lessons he is learning in the classroom. This link between learning and doing has to have a more favorable effect than learning alone. School lunch programs in many schools also are now being extended to include breakfast. Great efforts are being made, too, to reach children in poverty areas with breakfast. Fruit or fruit juice, a half pint of milk, cereal and often a high protein food such as meat or eggs make up the breakfast pattern being followed. My hat is off to the school lunch people. They deserve the full support of everyone.

Children Better Fed

Children are better fed as a result. And the effort at school is not just one of feeding.
