CONSERVATION COMMENTS

THE SEVEN SLEEPERS

Winter hardships for wildlife can be lumped in three general classes. The reduced amount of food during the winter season is magnified by deep snow and ice. The wind and cold increases the need for good food to furnish energy and increases the need for good warm protective cover. Deep snow makes travel between food and shelter harder.

Over the years, each form of wildlife has evolved its own methods of meeting these hardships. Some move into special types of winter cover, such as the deer yards.

Some have special adaptations, such as the built-in snowshoes of the ruffed grouse and varying hare or the hollow insulating hair of the deer. Some store food in or near their winter quarters like the squirrel or the beaver. The more mobile ones may just take off for better climates.

There is one elite group, often referred to as the "seven sleepers" that take the easy way by just curling up and sleeping the winter out. This group is made up of an unlikely assortment: bats, bears, chipmunks, coons, jumping mice, skunks and woodchucks.

Their ability to sleep away the winter varies considerably. The jumping mouse, woodchuck, and some of the bats are true hibernators, while the others are just heavy sleepers.

The true hibernators have a marked reduction in their body temperature, rate of breathing and heart rate, while there is relatively little change from normal in the case of the heavy sleepers.

Studies of the woodchuck have shown that during hibernation its body temperature drops from a normal of 96 degrees to about 42 degrees. Its normal breathing rate of about 280 times an hour drops to about 14 times an hour. Bats and jumping mice have similar changes.

The hibernation is literally "out cold" and must thaw out before it can regain consciousness. The deep sleepers, by contrast, can be aroused from their sleep readily. Since the hibernator's body temperature is close to that of the surrounding air, bats in warm caves with a temperature of 50 degrees will awake faster than those in cold caves where the temperature is about 40 degrees.

Nature has built a safety mechanism into the animals so that when their body temperature drops almost to the freezing point they will wake up. If their body temperature should drop to 32 it would prove fatal.

Except for the chipmunk, all the seven sleepers are noted for the layer of fat they put on before they hibernate. This is the fuel that keeps them going throughout the winter. A chunk may den up a plump eight pounds in the fall and emerge in the spring just about half his former self.

Instead of storing his food under his belt, the chipmunk stores it under his bed. As the pangs of hunger arouse him, he rolls over and eats a tasty acorn.

The heavy sleepers, the bear, skunk and particularly the raccoon, may venture forth during any warm spell. The usual January thaw brings out a flurry of coon activity. In late February and early March the tracks of both skunks and woodchucks become fairly common, though it isn't necessarily the warming weather that gets them out. During this period the male of both species are out looking for romance, checking all the neighboring dens for their lady friends.

It is during the deep sleep periods of the winter that the bears give birth to their young. The maternity ward can be a cave in a rockslide, a hollow log, or just a snug shelter under the low-hanging branches of a dense spruce. It is little wonder that a female bear doesn't show her face all winter - the cubs that she produces weigh only six to eight ounces. A newborn porcupine is fully as big!
